PSYCHOLOGY OF DAYLIGHT SAVING

The "psychology of daylight saving" has been investigated by Prof. George T. Patrick, of the University of Iowa, who makes most interesting observations in the November number of the Scientific Monthly. Dr. Patrick believes that the extreme conservatism of the American people had much to do with the failure of the daylight law. As an example of this he cites our present cumbersome system of weights and measures, pointing out that only the attitude of "we've got along so far, why change?" has prevented the introduction of the simple and convenient metric system.

"Many people could not reconcile themselves to standard time when Congress adopted it. For this reason getting the clock forward was a real step in the routine of many lives and they have could forget the old system. In this connection it will be noted that the cities which have passed their own daylight saving ordinance, after Congress repealed the national law, are among the most progressive in the country. Whereas the chief opposition to the law has been manifested in sections where extreme conservatism insist on retaining anything that has worked well enough before.

In examining his psychological inquiry, Prof. Patrick asserts that with the increased use of the electric light there has come a steady displacement in the relation between the daylight day and the human day, the majority of people rising two, three or even four hours after daylight and remaining up three, five or six hours after daylight. "Every year," he says, "it seems a little harder to get to bed or to get up at the accustomed time. Automobiles are a factor in late hours. College or high school students study of later hours or give themselves more time for social diversion. It is out of date to go to bed early. To meet the requirements of modern life more and more of our industries continue to run the night.

The professor believes that the discontinuance of daylight saving will be only temporary as he says that it represents just what the present age stands for—health, economy, conservation and common sense. He is of the opinion that farmers and millmen made no good case against the law but that they could have easily adjusted themselves to it. He declares that "the need for synchronizing farm and city hours of labor during day or four months of the year is not so great as to ask a whole nation, during the entire summer to begin to work all four hours of the morning and live by artificial light an hour later at night." He believes it is very likely that in the end daylight saving, already reintroduced in many localities for public health and pleasure and industrial efficiency, will become a national law. Its defeat apparently was accomplished not by a majority, but by an opposition minority.

LET'S HOPE HE'S RIGHT

Hermit Joe of the Big Kinnon, Pennsylvania, predicts a "drier winter" than his prediction on the fact that the woods folk, bears, squirrels, etc., are usually coupled with far this fall. Anybody who has proved a forerunner in the stores recently will rather of the opinion that his prediction is correct for the time of the American fauna. They may have decided to wear last year's coat, and so have we.

After President Wilson has permitted hands to drive American investors out of Mexico and Central American countries, and British or German investors secure control of all the best oil property, perhaps he will awake to the importance of oil as a fuel in the operation of a merchant marine, a navy, and industry in general. But, as usual, he will awake too late.
